David (and Teena),

As I know EPA Region 10 is quite interested in the KM Trans Mountain Pipeline expansion, this media summary may be of interest to you.

Thanks

Kendall

Ian Anderson and Scott Stoness of Kinder Morgan held a teleconference with media this morning. Here is a brief summary of what was discussed and some of the media coverage.

The teleconference last about 20 minutes.

Mr. Ian Anderson gave an overview, indicating that they filed full and complete responses this week to 5600 intervenor requests. Even those that were outside of scope, they tried to provide some info.

The project will remain on current timetable pending review and approval of project:

- Construction summer 2016
- In Service summer 2018

He then touched on their Emergency Response Plans and reiterated that plans have been made available in full (non-redacted) to municipalities, the province and first responders. Redacted versions provided to the NEB review in order to protect safety and security.

He mentioned that in Canada there is no specific legislation on how emergency management plans are made available to the public. He reiterated that they have heard the public concerns and committed to helping establish protocols and procedures with industry and regulator to enhance transparency.

Media questions and topics:

Bloomberg - Shippers Commitments

CBC Radio - Emergency Management Plans

Canadian Press - Emergency Management Plans

Burnaby News Leader - Emergency Management Plans and Communities

Canadian Press - Security Climate in Washington State

AM 770 Vancouver - Cost or Timeline changes for project

Vancouver Observer - Threats to assets

Public excluded from knowing about Kinder Morgan's emergency response plans

The Province

The head of Kinder Morgan says a full emergency response plan for the proposed $5.4-billion Trans Mountain pipeline expansion in B.C. will remain hidden, though a similar scheme has been made public in neighbouring Washington.

Ian Anderson says the National Energy Board did not require the company to publicly disclose full details of its oil spill response plan for the Trans Mountain pipeline.

He says regulation is different in the U.S., where the Department of Ecology has posted Kinder Morgan's emergency response plan online for the Washington section of the Trans Mountain pipeline.

Anderson says the company will make its full plans available to municipalities, first responders and the B.C. government but, the public has only been able to view a redacted version.

He says Kinder Morgan has nothing to hide but there are legitimate national security and public safety reasons for not divulging the entire plan.

Anderson says the company will work with Canadian industry on a process for publicly disclosing response plans.

Washington State can view spill-response plans for pipeline that B.C. cannot Globe and Mail

Washington State has documents outlining emergency response plans for a Kinder Morgan pipeline – plans similar to those British Columbians have been told by Canada's National Energy Board they're not allowed to see due to security concerns.

The B.C. government lost a battle with the National Energy Board in January to have greater access to Kinder Morgan's Trans Mountain pipeline emergency response plan (ERP). Kinder Morgan had already provided B.C. with a version of the plan, but significant portions were blacked out.
